What Makes a Good Lawyer?

When navigating the vast and complex world of law, you'll often find that there's simply so much information to process.

If you find yourself in a situation where you need the help of someone more experienced in this field, it's well worth investing in a good attorney. However, with so many different ones to choose from, the choice is far from simple. With that in mind, let's look at some of the necessary skills for essentially anyone working in law.

5 things that make a good lawyer

1. Communication – Regardless of the situation, in any given testimony, having an attorney that can clearly and concisely communicate with everybody in the court is essential
2. Decisiveness – Sometimes an attorney simply won't have all the information they need to hand, and it's important that they can come to a clear and logical conclusion at any given time
3. Quick thinking – Anyone in this field will need to be able to analyze a great deal of information with little preparation, to find the best solution to a tight spot in a flash
4. Perseverance – A lawyer working a case will need to be able to commit to the job and give it their all to lead the case to victory – something that often takes a considerable amount of work and effort
5. Preparation – From taking the time to complete adequate research, to getting everything together ready for presentation; there are a variety of ways that a lawyer will need to be prepared for their work if they want to win their case
