How to Find a Job in Translation

If you have experience in a few languages and want to put your skills to good use, it might be worth becoming a translator. However, you might find that it takes more than being multilingual to be a successful translator – although the demand for experts in the field can make it an excellent opportunity for a range of individuals.

Top 5 tips for anyone who wants to get a job in translations

1. Put in the time to learn the language

Whether you're already fluent or you're looking for something new to learn, you must have had enough experience to be able to easily, clearly, and correctly translate anything that comes your way.

2. Consider what's available

It shouldn't be surprising that the most common languages that are needed will offer the most work – but this can also mean more competition for you, too.

3. Improve on your technological skills

If you're going into a business where you're going to be doing work online and on electronic devices, you need to be experienced in using them and all the programs you'll need to be a successful translator.

4. Gain some credibility

Whether you offer your services as a freelance translator or get certification for your multilingual skills, there are often a few ways that you can prove your capabilities to potential customers.

5. Never stop learning

Even if you're fluent in one language, why not put in the time to learn another or regularly brush up on your skills? After all, keeping on top of your knowledge won't hurt.
